The Hang-Up Script

Print this page. Put it by every phone in the house.

The Script (say it exactly)

"I need to verify this. I'm hanging up and calling you back on your number. If this is really you, you'll answer. If it's not — goodbye."

That's it. No arguing. No explaining. No apologizing. Hang up.

What Happens Next (the 60-second rule)

1. Hang up — immediately, mid-sentence if needed.
 2. Call the real person on their known number from your contacts.
 - Answers? Great. Verify it was them. Done.
 - Busy/no answer? Go to step 3.
 3. Post in the family group: "Possible scam call using [NAME]'s voice. Verify before any money moves."
 4. If money already moved — do NOT follow the caller's "fix it" instructions. Go straight to the 72-Hour Recovery Playbook.

What The Scammer Will Say (and your answer)

They say	You say
"I'm injured, I can't think!"	"Then you understand why I need the word. What is it?"
"There's no time!"	"There's always time to verify. Goodbye."
"Don't you recognize my voice?!"	"I recognize clones exist. What's the word?"
"I'll get in trouble if you tell anyone!"	"Goodbye."
"I'm calling from a friend's phone."	"Call me from your number, or FaceTime me. I'll wait."

"You're being paranoid!"

"Goodbye."

The rule: every answer redirects to the secret. If they can't produce it, the conversation is over.

Why This Works

The scammer's script depends on keeping you on the line, emotional, and moving fast. The Hang-Up Script does the opposite: it ends the call, buys time, and forces the scammer to either produce family-only knowledge or lose the mark. They will always choose to lose the mark — there are millions of other numbers to dial.

A clone can copy your voice. It cannot copy your family's secrets. That gap is the entire product.
